West Outbreak Thus Far...

Police, Demonstrators Clash In Violent Campus Disorders

By The Associated Press
Police and 1,200 demonstrators clashed in a clash of arms on the University of California Berkeley campus in the worst outbreak of violence thus far in the current national epidemic of student unrest.

When the battle was over Thursday, 10 students and 10 officers were injured and police had arrested 17 youths and a girl. The clash began when police tried to disperse demonstrators who had begun a series of sit-ins in the city's downtown area.

In Chicago about 100 Negro students were arrested in the police office at Roosevelt University during a demonstration against the Vietnam War.

The demonstrators, who were armed with rocks, bricks and other weapons, were later dispersed by police. The demonstrators were later dispersed by police. The demonstrators were later dispersed by police.

The battle over divergent public policy has moved to the new Mexico Legislature.

The fight has the potential for disruption of the orderly process of the legislature.

Sen. Ashery Dean, D-Denver, chairman of the Legislative School Study Committee, said on Thursday that the passage of the new bill is essential to the state.

The committee's report, which was released last week, called for a major restructuring of the state's educational system.

"More detailed comments will be available when enough time has passed to do a realistic comparison," Dunn said.

Dunn said statistical comparisons between Senate Bill 1 and the Rams' bill presented themselves very properly on Thursday.

"It was extremely clear," Dunn said, "that the Rams' bill was a much more realistic approach to the problem."
